> We do not believe that it is a problem necessarily: when you do the risk and reward analysis, you look at the risks/rewards associated with ownership of the asset. Those are risks that are inherent in the financial asset (or regulatory asset) that is being transferred. We know that ‘late-payment risk’ is problematic, however, it’s normally thought of in the context of the obligor being late in paying. It’s not normally thought of in the context of the cash having been collected is not remitted by the party to which it has been remitted. The Term Sheet says that IESO “will agree to remit to the Financing Entity any clean energy adjustment amounts collected by the LDC, regardless of whether the LDC remitted those amounts to the IESO for remittance to the Financing Entity.” This strikes us as more analogous to liquidity risk. Here’s what the KPMG guidance says (Insights into IFRS) says about liquidity risk:

>
> <image001.jpg>
>
> We think it’s key that IESO only would be required to ‘fund’ the amounts actually collected but not remitted.

>
> Neither EY nor PWC provide any guidance on the definition of risks. However, Deloitte has the following observation:
>
> The overall securitization has liquidity risk associated with the fact that there is a mismatch in the timing of cash inflows and outflows. It is important to recognize that liquidity risk arising in the structured entity from differences in the contractual timing of cash flows of the assets and the notes issued to acquire the assets is not part of the transferred assets. This compares to late payment risk and credit default risk which is inherent in the assets. However, if the asset pays late, the transferee may not be able to meet its obligations under the notes. This liquidity risk only arises when the assets are placed inside the securitization structure. The liquidity risk associated with late payment risk is therefore not included in the transferor’s risk and rewards assessment in determining derecognition for the transferor. However, the impact of liquidity risk will be included in determining whether the entity should consolidate that structured entity, in particular in the assessment of whether the entity is exposed, or has variable returns from its involvement with the structured entity.

Specifically, please look at the commingling risk mitigant on page 4 of the term sheet. The proposal, which we have just seen for the first time, is that the IESO would either (A) post a letter of credit, or deposit funds into a reserve account; or (B) contractually assume responsibility for LDC defaults. The risk being addressed is default by an LDC to remit to the IESO clean energy adjustment amounts collected from consumers.

> Just to follow up on Andrew Maciel's commitment to provide us with a revised term sheet for the guarantee reflecting yesterday's discussion, I was wondering if that can be done EOD Monday. I had a chat with Gadi and given some upcoming internal meetings at senior levels it would be helpful to provide the revised guarantee in front of decision makers.
